THE following extract from the Truths and Fictions of the Middle Ages, by the late Sir Francis Palgrave," has been furnished us by a correspondent, apropos of our recent notice of Dr. Hein-Brunner's researches:

apropos of our recent notice of Dr. Heinrich Brunner's researches:

"Until the reign of the Todors, the jury, instead of being the peers of the accused, by whom his guilt was to be tried, a court before whom the validity of the evidence given by the witnesses was to be investigated, were the sworn witnesses themselves, and their true saying, the veredictum, or verdict, was the suming-up of their own testimony. Hence it was the duty of the sheriff to learn their previous knowledge of facts, and to summon those by whom, in the words of the process yet in use, "the truth could be better known." Thus, for example if the authenticity of a deed was contested, the parties named as witnesses in the charge of attestation were not subpensed to give evidence that they had seen it duly sealed, but were themselves associated to the jury.

"So consistent was the ancient law that, if the crime was of such a secret nature that the neighborhood, the visue, or vicinetum, the name technically given to the jury, could not reasonably be supposed to have a knowledge of it—murder by the administration of poison may be instanced—then the accused party could not be tried by a jury at all. The jarers were brought before the judge by the sheriff, upon the same principle that the actorney now collects his witnesses.

jurers were brought before the judge by the sheriff, upon the same principle that the attorney now collects his witnesses in order to obtain a conviction. He got together those who, in his opinion, could best make out the case. It is to be feared that the sheriff—of the modern limb of the law we will say nothing— was not always overscrapulous as to the means by which that end was to be at-tained.

A Caravan or Death.—A fearful pilgrinage is described by the great Eastern explorer. Vambery, who met it once on his travels, and was deeply impressed by its weird and dread appearance. It was a procession of the dead, and not of the hiving, and yet as far as the eye could reach across the vast plain, there, in distant Persia, the followers of Allah, falling in strangely enough, with the belief of the Chinese heathens, fancy they can not rest in foreign soil, and, if they can at all scrape the pittance together to provide for their bodies a resting place at Kufa, where their great chieftain lies buried. Hence, every year this fearful procession of coffins slung on the backs of Camels and asses, starts for the uttermost confines of Persia, and swelling by additions from every town and hamlet, gradually reaches gigantic proportions, additions from every town and hamlef, cradually reaches gigantic proportions, till at last a vast army of horrid decaying pilgrims reaches the sacred burying ground. The unfortunate Arabs who undertake the dismal task, with their heads enveloped in thick shawls and faces of deadly pallor, not unfrequently succomb before they reach the end of their journey, and thousands of coffins are simply cast down, till a huge pile rises like a terrible mausoleum on the immense plain. It is not without reason that travelers and physicians have looked upon this awe-inspiring place as the ed upon this awe-inspiring place as the crade of the cholera.

Cumous .- A tribe in the interior of Africa have a curious religious ceremony. Africa have a curious religious ceremony. It is a dance in which the parties plant a good solid kick on each other, and they keep it up for hours. It must be very enjoyable, of course, and well calculated to develop a feeling of reverent cestacy in the participants; vast improvement would be made by intoducing a few pairs of copper-toed boots to the assemblage. This would tend to exalt the saints, we imagine, and vividly remind them of Ints would tend to exait the saints, we imagine, and vividly remind them of their latter end. Then we should like to go there, ourselves, as the sole wholesale agent for some popular limiment. There is money in this thing if it is worked up

A MINER in Wales has recently unsuccessfully applied the steam jet for ventilating mines. Unlike previous attempts, the jets have in this instance been placed on the surface, sidewise to the upcast shaft, the mouth of which is sealed. A shait, the mouth of which is sealed. A number of plain cast-iron cylinders are placed in an upright position, with a steam jet applied at or near the bottom of each, steam being supplied by two boilers, one of which is kept in reserve. Here we have the whole machinery on the surface moving each plan action. Here we have the whole machinery on the surface, moving parts being entirerly absent and the danger of an underground furnace also avoided. This arrangement has been largely patronized and is rep-resented as being highly satisfactory.

A Pronta minister, while thawing a frozen wasp the other day to see if heat would rescusitate it, was astonished to find how hot the sharp end of the insect became in a very few seconds, and those who live next door state they thought they heard a piteous ery for "Helen Blazes" by a man's voice.

Few persons are aware of the extent or importance of the skunkskin trade in Michigan. It is estimated that not less than sixty thousand of these fragrant animals were sacrificed in Michigan atone in 1871, and that 1872 will show a much larger "catch." The skins bring from $2 for "prime black," down to 20c. for inferior qualities.
